SWEET 16!
sweet adjective

a : pleasing to the mind or feelings : agreeable, gratifying — often used as a generalized term of approval how sweet it is. (Miriam Webster)

Sixteen consecutive years in the top 25 of US News and World Report’s ranking of International Business Programs is indeed sweet!

The new mission statement of UMSL is encapsulated by “We Transform Lives.” That transformation has clearly been evident over the last 16 years. During that time, over 500 College of Business Administration students have been transformed by study abroad, our faculty have informed and transformed the academy and industry with over 70 publications and 36,000 citations, and our Advisory Board has donated over $175,000.

As this spring 2019 edition of our IBI Newsletter shows, that transformation is enabled by the research excellence of talented and world-renowned faculty; the accomplishments of our adventurous and driven students; the tireless efforts of our dedicated staff; and the generosity of our passionate and engaged Advisory Board.

We welcome you to peruse this edition of our newsletter and as you relive the last year, I am confident you will agree with us: HOW SWEET UMSL IB IS!
International volunteer missions spur MBA student’s passion for teaching, research

As Damon Walker prepared to teach his first class, he was nearly overcome with fear. He wasn’t a trained educator, so a series of doubts ran through his mind: Would his work make an impact? Would he be able to connect with the trainees? Was he armed with the right instructional strategies?

His inability to speak to the class without an interpreter only made the anxiety worse. But when the morning came and he introduced himself, everything changed.

"Once the class started and I said, ‘Hello and bonjour,’ the anxiety left," said Walker, an MBA student at the University of Missouri–St. Louis. "It was game time. It was time to go. I was like, ‘I came to help, so it’s time to help.’"

Placed in Guinea on a volunteer mission, Walker pushed forward with his lesson following the stressful greeting, knowing that his work would enhance the West African community in which he found himself.

Walker, who graduated with a Bachelor of Science in Information Systems from UMSL in 2016, made the summer 2017 trip as a first-time volunteer for The John Ogonowski and Doug Bereuter Farmer-to-Farmer Program. Sponsored by Winrock International, Walker arrived in Guinea to teach an introduction to computers course to employees of the country’s Department of Agriculture.

The skill level of the trainees varied – some had limited skill sets and others had no experience at all. In response, he began to form an individualized teaching method, meeting the trainees wherever their knowledge might be with internet usage and Microsoft programs Word, PowerPoint and Excel.

“I had to lean on my leadership and research skills to make sure I was communicating effectively,” said Walker, who earned a bronze President’s Volunteer Service Award for his work. “I would consider this experience to be diplomatic because there is a sense of pride knowing that I was able to assist the improvement of the local community there as well as the world. I’m eager about doing more volunteering endeavors.”

He’s also eager to continue teaching.

When he returned stateside, he became a tutor for other UMSL students and was recruited to teach a programming and coding course for elementary and middle school students in the Jennings School District. His time in Guinea also inspired his return to the Winrock volunteer program in May.

His second three-week trip sent him to Senegal, a country bordering Guinea, to work with two vocational schools on developing a website and alumni database.

The two schools lacked both of these infrastructures prior to Walker’s arrival, so he hopes his time there will help the programs garner wider visibility and boost enrollment.

While the trainees were gaining new technical skills, Walker said he was learning alongside them about himself and the world around him.

When he would return to his hotel for the evening, Walker’s day was just beginning. He spent significant time in his room reflecting on how to enhance his instruction as well as practicing French and Wolof, a native language for many in Senegal.

“I’m kind of an eager learner, so in the evenings I would go back to my room and I would try to learn a few words,” Walker said. “I was trying to learn French and Wolof at the same time. I would come back to class and I would try some of the words, and they would encourage me to try more and give me the right way to pronounce certain words.”

Walker’s always strived to be a continual learner. He’d already developed a career in telecommunications when he decided to go back to school. As a data analyst at CenturyLink, he became interested in some of the technical elements of the company, so he began taking classes part time at St. Louis Community College–Florissant Valley.

When he was finished with his associate degree, Walker transferred to UMSL’s College of Business Administration, where he became particularly intrigued by his information systems coursework.

He enrolled full time upon his transition to UMSL while also maintaining his normal work schedule. He admits the experience was “an uphill battle” but that it also gave him a better business perspective of his own company and others in the industry.

“It’s definitely a process,” Walker said while laughing. “It’s a lot of hard work, a lot of late nights, a lot of long weekends. It takes dedication. You just have to be dedicated to the process.”

He became so ingrained in the process that he decided to transition immediately into UMSL’s graduate program.

“I have a strong thirst for knowledge, and I didn’t feel complete after my bachelor’s,” Walker said. “I felt like there was more to learn.”

Now halfway through the MBA program, Walker’s determined that he’s still not done with his educational pursuits. He’s currently researching PhD programs across the globe with the hopes of eventually becoming a college professor.

“After the farmer-to-farmer experience, I would jump at almost any opportunity to help where I can,” Walker said. “That experience, along with the encouragement of the professors at UMSL, is really what pushed me toward researching a PhD program and getting into teaching and research.”
The International MBA at the University of Missouri—St. Louis is a distinctive program for uniquely qualified individuals who are passionate about leading and transforming organizations in the global economy. During this two-year, rigorous academic structure, students complete one year with UMSL and one year with a partner university. The dual-degree program consists of two components: academic and cultural. The academic component takes place in the classroom and in a series of customized, professional development workshops.

The professional development workshops, called IMBA Information Sessions, are specially tailored for each incoming cohort. Planned and facilitated by Renita Miller, program manager for the International Business Institute, the information sessions provide ‘tools for success’ through a series of presentations and exercises which are led by invited faculty and subject matter experts. These workshops, along with company visits, prepare students for entry into international enterprises by enabling a comprehensive understanding of the intricacies of international markets and industries.

The International MBA program is proud to announce that Qiaoni Linda Jing accepted the invitation to be the first Executive in Residence for the IMBA program. Linda has agreed to present a sequence of workshops (“Cross-Cultural Effectiveness,” “How Things Work in Corporate America,” and “Networking, Job Search Strategies, and Tactics”) and mentor IMBA students on cross-cultural communication and leadership.

Currently, Linda serves as chief of staff, senior director of global corporate affairs at Bayer Crop Science (formerly Monsanto). However, Linda has worn many hats since she joined the company in 2009. Her previous roles include: director of strategy & operations - Global R&D; global operations manager - Vegetables Supply Chain; distribution strategy lead - Latin America South Commercial; regional operations lead - U.S. Northwest; and strategic planning lead - U.S. Commercial.

Linda’s passion for the promotion of cross-culture understanding and leadership is evident throughout her professional journey and in servicing the community. Linda is a cabinet co-chair for the United Way Multi-Cultural Leadership Society; vice president and board member for the Asian American Chamber of Commerce, St. Louis. Linda was a recipient of the 2018 Most Intriguing Award, presented by Who’s Who Diversity in Color; and featured in an article in the St. Louis Business Journal for her personal and professional achievements in cultivating global connections. Linda was recently recognized by the White House Initiative on Asian Americans & Pacific Islanders at its 2018 Leadership Summit. Linda holds a BE in industrial engineering from Soochow University, an MA in economics from Fudan University, both in China, and an MBA from Kellogg School of Management at Northwestern University in Evanston, IL.

“I connect the dots,” Linda says when describing her passion, “solving complex cross-function business challenges and building high-performance multicultural teams.”

Linda’s international professional networking skills and connections are an exciting addition to the IMBA program. The College of Business and the International Business Institute are truly fortunate to have Linda on board this year. The International MBA is just the program for those seeking a rewarding, challenging and exciting way to obtain two high-quality MBA degrees and valuable international experience. To learn more about the IMBA program, explore our website or, better yet, stop by the campus and talk with current IMBA students, staff and faculty who make up this outstanding international experience.

UMSL’s international business program celebrates 16 years in US News rankings

By Sarah Bell

The winning streak continues for the international business program at the University of Missouri–St. Louis. For the 16th consecutive year, U.S. News & World Report ranked the College of Business Administration program in the Top 25. UMSL earned a No. 20 national ranking, up four spots from the previous year.

“Year after year, UMSL offers exceptional education and programs to bright, globally minded students,” said Joe Rottman, associate dean and director of the International Business Institute. “Being recognized as one of the best colleges for international business for the past 16 years is a testament to the world-class faculty and staff who fully prepare students for their careers and lives in an increasingly global society.”

During the 16-year reign, UMSL awarded 994 international business degrees and hosted 475 study abroad trips. The program has also ranked eighth nationally for faculty research productivity and received $3.5 million in research grants.

“UMSL’s international business program just keeps getting better,” Dean of the College of Business Administration Charlie Hoffman said. “We are honored to receive these high marks, which reflect the success of our graduates and the dedication of our talented UMSL team. We look forward to advancing the next generation of graduates who will go on to transform our world.”
Kristina Medvedeva was ready for her solo intercontinental move to St. Louis well before booking a plane ticket in 2014. She had done her homework. A master’s degree in North American studies, fluency in English and an independent spirit – one cultivated after leaving home at the age of 16 to pursue a bachelor’s degree – primed her for the transition. But even with a resume full of preparatory experiences, the Russia native says no amount of time or research could have fully readied her for life as an international student in America.

“When you are in a different country, you are out of your comfort zone constantly,” Medvedeva said. “All the time — every single moment — you are out of your comfort zone. It doesn’t matter how comfortable you get, at points there will be situations that will be unusual for you.”

Kristina Medvedeva

Now, the University of Missouri–St. Louis MBA candidate thrives in new and occasionally uncomfortable situations. A lifelong learner of languages and business practices, Medvedeva traded her professional job and life in Nizhny Novgorod, Russia, in 2012 for a graduate program at the University of Bonn in Germany – the first of a series of international moves.

“I have always wanted to live abroad because I think that is how you can broaden your horizons,” she said. “I have traveled a lot in my life as well, but traveling and living in a different country are completely different things. “That is why I always tell students I work with to go abroad not just to visit a country for a week or so, but try to spend a little more time there because this is how you see how people live from a completely different perspective.”

As she learned about international relations, economic policies in North American countries and many other topics while centered in Germany, Medvedeva seized an opportunity to apply that research in the U.S. The University of Bonn offered a one-year exchange program at UMSL, and although she previously had never heard of the university, Medvedeva applied after researching UMSL’s College of Business Administration.

The year allowed her to integrate into American culture while developing relationships with several faculty members and students. Two semesters went by quickly, but the people she met and experiences she had left a lasting impression – one that would prompt her return to UMSL upon completing her master’s thesis in Bonn.

“I met really great mentors at UMSL,” Medvedeva said. “I took some business classes while here on exchange, and I really enjoyed how the business school operates and how the classes are taught. The system is really different from Germany and Russia, but I like the environment. From my point of view, it’s really diverse. I am foreign here, but I have never considered myself an outsider.”

Since returning for the MBA program in 2016, Medvedeva has fully embraced life in St. Louis, particularly on campus. She holds graduate assistantships with the business college and the College of Education while also teaching English to native Russian speakers through online platforms. These responsibilities keep her schedule unpredictable, but she believes the varying experiences will have long-term benefits.

“I think being at UMSL in such a diverse workplace, I have become a more mature person, and I have broadened my outlooks so much,” she said. “I will never be the same person again.”

One of these key changes includes a newfound interest in digital and social media marketing. Medvedeva has professional marketing experience from working for an IKEA-owned shopping center in Russia and for DHL while she studied in Germany. However, she hadn’t considered this area of marketing as a potential career path until taking a few UMSL classes and then serving as a teaching assistant for Perry Drake, an assistant teaching professor of digital and social media marketing.

“When I came here and started learning a completely new aspect of marketing, I started to think that it was interesting, and I realized that this is where the world is going right now,” she said. “We are all on digital. We are all on social media. A lot of funds are placed into social media and digital marketing, so I will most likely continue that path or something related to that.”

On track to complete the MBA program in May, Medvedeva is ready to trade her textbooks for a full-time marketing position. While she is unsure where geographically this career will lead her, she continues to live by a belief that “the world is open.”
Life in Malawi inspires Annie Mbale’s goal to empower women

Annie Mbale was organizing a few of her belongings earlier this year when a piece of paper she didn’t recognize fell to the floor. Curiosity drew her to pick up the note and begin to read through the bulleted list: graduate from high school, wait until at least 30 to get married, leave the village. The list continued on with 27 more self-imposed challenges for Mbale, a Malawi native, to meet by the time she was 30.

Some of the checklist items were frivolous goals her 15-year-old self had composed after flipping through magazines. Eating pizza with her hands and resembling Beyoncé were a few such items. Others were loftier career and educational ambitions she wasn’t sure she’d ever be able to accomplish.

Fifteen years later, the University of Missouri–St. Louis graduate and current MBA student has crossed off all but three items and expanded on many of the goals. But until recently, Mbale wasn’t particularly proud of what she had accomplished thus far.

“I wish I was proud,” she said. “That’s one of my struggles. I don’t get satisfied that easily, and maybe that’s because I’ve always said I needed to do better. I didn’t feel very accomplished until I found the list I wrote myself when I was 15. When I read through it, I finally felt like I had done well.”

Until the list reappeared around her 30th birthday, Mbale had never discussed or shown it to anyone. Even she had forgotten about it. But she does remember drafting it at a tearful moment in her teens and then tucking it away, somewhat embarrassed about its contents and also unsure that anyone would care to hear about her dreams.

Growing up in Malawi, Mbale’s main ambitions were to acquire a strong education, get out of the village and then empower other women through her knowledge and experiences. None of those goals were simple. Mbale’s parents, who were educated professionals, died when she was 11.

The couple had invested their life savings to start a business a year earlier, leaving Mbale and her three siblings with no financial stability. The children then left their comfortable life in the city to live with extended family in a small village. Mbale’s strained financial circumstances particularly plagued her high school education. All students pay for high school in Malawi. If students don’t pay tuition after three weeks, they’re sent home. At points when Mbale didn’t have the financing, she still tried to find ways to educate herself and stay out of the village, where she would be repeatedly encouraged to stop going to school and just get married. When she couldn’t be in the classroom, she would spend time reading in the school library or peeping through windows attempting to listen in on lessons. She was one of the top students in the class and had no intention of slipping behind. Even the walks to school could be physically and emotionally draining. Girls were expected to wake up early to help with household chores. By the time they got to school, many were already tired and found it difficult to concentrate. Female students were also repeatedly harassed on their walks. Among other things, they were asked to take their tops off and told they could not proceed down a path until men had groped their breasts.

“It got to a point where I thought, ‘OK. Whatever. They can beat me up. I am still going to go to school. I’m still going to make it,’” Mbale said. “It was a tough ride, but I knew that the only way I could get out of that was to get an education. It wasn’t easy. I won’t lie. It didn’t feel hard until now that I think about it and see American culture. I wasn’t supposed to be going through that s—, but I did.”

Luckily, Mbale found someone who took a vested interest in her education during her junior year. Alexis Denny, an American Peace Corps volunteer, arrived at her school as its first female instructor. Other teachers directed Denny to Mbale since she was the highest achieving female in the class and founder of the school’s Girls Club. The pair began to build a strong rapport until Mbale started missing school. Denny caught Mbale peering through a window one day and reprimanded her for missing class. Mbale explained that her absence wasn’t her choice: She simply didn’t have the money to continue going to school. Denny then gave Mbale a life-changing proposal. She offered to pay for Mbale’s education if she came to live with her and helped her navigate Malawian culture, cook on an open fire and live without electricity. Mbale agreed hesitantly.

“I was scared at first,” she said. “But I told my friends and family, ‘This is an opportunity, and I need to go.’ We became friends, and now we are sisters.”

The assistance helped Mbale finish high school and also provided an introduction to the American education system. At the time, there was only one university in Malawi, and Mbale had little hope that she would gain admission. She mentioned the dilemma to Denny, who encouraged Mbale to apply for a student visa to study in the U.S. It took three years, but Mbale... eventually acquired a visa and admission into Jefferson College, a community college near Denny’s family in Hillsboro, Missouri. Now that she was continuing her education and out of the village, Mbale had one major goal remaining – develop a meaningful career working with women. Elements of that vision have evolved over the years, but Mbale traces the ambition to grade school.

“When I was in fourth grade, I said, ‘I’m going to be a police officer, and I’m going to beat up all the men who are beating their wives,’” she recalled. “I seriously said that. Then in sixth grade, I was going to be a human rights lawyer helping women. It has always been about women. I realized a few years ago that I’ve been a feminist for a long time.”

Mbale’s attitude toward advancing women’s rights and interests is based on the plight of those in her home country and the strength of the females in her family. “My family is influenced by women,” she said. “But growing up in an environment that as a woman you are less, I think that’s what inspired me. I won’t lie that it has made me the person I’ve become today. I’ve been seen as less and less and less, but I’ve believed in myself. I’m not less. I can be more.”

When she arrived at Jefferson College, Mbale still maintained her desire to become a human rights attorney. She eagerly navigated her way through school and life in America with the assistance of her newfound family, adding a term as Jefferson College’s Student Senate president to her résumé. As her graduation approached, Mbale began researching institutions where she could finish her bachelor’s degree. She stumbled upon UMSL and its high-ranking international business program. It was then that she realized a business degree could better serve her interests in advancing the lives and careers of women.

Mbale enrolled at UMSL and quickly became involved in a variety of international student and College of Business Administration activities. By 2016, she had earned her long-awaited college degree with an added certificate from the Pierre Laclede Honors College. She’s the first woman in her high school class to earn a bachelor’s degree. Mbale now expects to graduate with an MBA and certificate in digital marketing in May. Until then, she’s keeping busy as a graduate research assistant for UMSL’s International Business Institute, digital marketing teaching assistant and virtual mentor for girls in Malawi. She’s also interning this summer for Odd Couples Housing, a service company that pairs healthy seniors with young professionals or college students for shared housing. As a digital and social media manager for Odd Couples, Mbale is helping enhance the online presence of the fledgling company. But with Odd Couples’ two distinct demographics, she’s also offered input on traditional marketing methods.

“The internship has been a challenge, which is good for me,” she said. “It’s challenged me to think beyond. When I came in, I had this proposal of what I was going to do. Now that I’m doing the internship, it’s changing every day.” With two semesters left and professional experiences underway, Mbale is looking ahead to the future. She’s not sure where she’ll be in a year, but she’s creating a new checklist to help guide her.

“Honestly, I’ve gone through a lot, and I’ve survived it all,” she said. “That’s something that I’m proud of about myself. I know that no matter what life throws at me, I’ll be able to handle it.”
UMSL students dip their toes into international travel with faculty-led trips

By Jessica Rogen

Drake Anderson spent most of his nights in Spain getting lost—on purpose. The University of Missouri—St. Louis senior was in Spain last summer on a two-week, study abroad trip led by Assistant Professor of Psychology Bettina Casad and Curators’ Professor of Comparative Politics and Gender Policies Joyce Mushaben. He took pleasure wandering the streets, eager to see where he might end up and what he might stumble upon. Thanks to the logic of city planning, he always found his way back.

“In the United States, I’ve always lived in the suburbs, so I don’t have a lot of experience being in cities and exploring,” Anderson said. “I had the realization that cities are all kind of built the same way. It’s really valuable to go and see that and experience the world more than your own backyard.”

The previous summer, Anderson had gone on a trip to Italy with Casad, but it was not until he was walking around Madrid that the similarities among most cities struck him. The unexpected bit of insight was one of the biggest takeaways Anderson brought back from his study abroad experience, but it certainly wasn’t the only thing he learned.

Experiencing new places, gaining confidence, meeting new people—all are frequently cited reasons to study abroad. UMSL offers three types of study abroad programs: exchange, where students attend foreign universities; affiliate or provider programs, which are led by private organizations or other universities; and faculty-led programs, which are created and taught by UMSL faculty. The last are also known as short-term because the trips run from two to six weeks and take place over the summer or winter intersession. There are approximately 25 such programs with most occurring every other year. About 200 students study abroad every year, which comes out to about 2 percent of UMSL’s full-time, degree-seeking population.
Or they can research attitudes toward immigrants across Europe like Anderson did on Casad’s trips. In Spain, he was in a group of six that learned about the history of the Muslim empire in Spain, current gender issues and domestic violence. They had the chance to witness attitudes toward immigration firsthand when Spain accepted a boat of stranded immigrants from Libya.

While in Barcelona, Spain, the travelers met with students from the Goethe-Institut, a German cultural-relations center, to meet and speak with the German students interning there. Next May, Casad heads to the United Kingdom for part two of a Brexit study just as the UK formally separates from the European Union.

“Getting the students involved in the research strengthens the academic component of the program, and then, depending on the students’ level of involvement, they can present at conferences, they can get publications,” Casad explained. “A couple of my students have gotten their own grants. It’s nice that students can get involved at a high level.”

Anderson will be attending the UK trip, and his collective study abroad experience has helped shape his ambitions.

“I want to be a professor and do research,” Anderson said. “If I would be able to do study abroad trips, that would be cool or even just travel on my own, but in some way I’m sure I’ll be traveling for a long time.”

Japanese-language student and sophomore Molly Motes agrees with Anderson. Her trip made her want to travel and study abroad again, maybe for a whole year. Last summer, Motes attended a two-week trip to Japan led by Assistant Teaching Professors Keiko Ueda and Hiroko Yoshii and faculty member Norihito Furuya.

The biannual trip, which offers culture, business or non-credit tracks, is UMSL’s largest, with 24 attendees. The travelers spent nine days in Tokyo and then moved west for the remaining five. They visited shrines, attended an expat panel and visited businesses and universities to talk and exchange ideas with their peers. They also made traditional buckwheat noodles known as soba and visited Nagano’s Jigokudani Monkey Park, where macaque monkeys bathe in the area’s hot springs.

“I got interested in the program because I’ve never been abroad before, and I really wanted to go to Japan since that’s a good way to get immersed in the language,” Motes said. “I was scared to just jump right in and go for a semester or whole year since I had no clue what I was doing.”
The students dubbed Ueda and Yoshii “okaa-sensei” or mother-teacher. The nickname reflects a wider sense of how faculty-led trips are a safe way to experience international travel for the first time, which is not unique to the Japan trip.

For seniors Bobby Nickel and Megan Baskin, their Oxford, England, pre-law trip led by Associate Teaching Professor Michael Costello was the first time either had traveled internationally, and both had trepidation about the long plane ride.

“I took a photo of the food on the overnight flight because I had never seen that before,” Nickel said. “The first time you fly over there you feel like it is taking forever, and on the way back, even though it’s a longer flight, technically, it felt like nothing.”

The trip was the inaugural collaboration with the University of Missouri–Kansas City School of Law’s Oxford Continuing Legal Education. Costello attended as a CLE student, then started thinking about how undergraduates would benefit. “I envisioned what a wonderful opportunity it would be for undergraduate students thinking about a pre-law or an international affairs career to spend time with 25 lawyers and business people being taught by British lawyers, judges and professors from Oxford,” he said. “The students got mentorship out of it. The lawyers enjoyed interacting with them socially and professionally.”

Costello received permission to make it an intercampus course, and the first cohort of five included students from UMSL, UMKC and the University of Missouri–Columbia. They attended lectures in the morning then toured in the afternoon, visiting the Supreme Court and Parliament and hiking to Arthur’s Seat in Edinburgh, Scotland. On free days the students and lawyers took other trips, visiting Wales and Bath and even going as far as Florence, Italy. They supped in the Great Hall at Christ Church, the Harry Potter dining hall film site. English food, such as the full English breakfast, clotted cream and fresh smoothies, impressed Nickel, and Baskin was amused to learn that Winston Churchill invented the romper during World War II. Both were struck by the differences between American and English culture, such as how fashionable and formal everyone in the UK dressed.

“It was an extraordinary experience, and I’m so glad I went,” Baskin said. “It’s a great opportunity to network and meet people and learn about different culture and people from different nations and how they go about their lives. I think I am a lot more independent and a lot more open-minded and understanding now.”

Nickel feels similarly and he plans to return to Oxford soon, possibly as a student.

“I’m applying to three UK law schools,” he said. “Mostly for kicks, but you never know.”

Global Disruption: Pushing the Limit

By Emily Lane

The 11th annual International Business Career Conference
The International Business Career Conference success story started in 2009. Since then, the conference has been offering opportunities to inquisitive students who want to test the waters of their potential career paths. Every year, this student-run event draws participants from universities all across the country – as far as Texas and California.

The conference is an ideal mix of learning and networking opportunities. It gives business students the opportunity to connect with professionals in their field of study. Participants are able to interact with organization executives, career professionals, and academic leaders who address the concerns of today’s students preparing to enter the international business workforce. This helps students get a clearer picture on the types of career opportunities available and the path to seek and attain international business objectives.

The conference schedule includes a keynote address, workshops, and a panel discussion, all of which are led by business executives and career professionals who are experts in their field. The workshops, which are divided into two sessions with each lasting forty minutes, offer students an opportunity to get answers about what they could do with a degree in international business. During each session, students choose one of the available concurrent workshops which contain various international business topics. To not waste any opportunity for networking, there is a networking lunch. Instead of walking around to each executive, students sit down and eat with them. This portion of the conference provides a superb and informal networking environment that allows students an opportunity to engage with more than 30 companies from a variety of industries. By giving a platform for interaction between students and business professionals from different regions and business backgrounds, students are able to learn about internships at the companies and seek career advice.

The IBCC is organized by two student organizations (the International Business Honor Society and the International Business Club with the guidance of the International Business Institute.) This year’s theme of Global Disruption: Pushing the Global Limits focused on the impact of geo-political challenges on global business. The following executives graciously joined the Executive Panel: Charles Allen (Bunge); Qiaoni Linda Jing (Bayer Crop Science); Mike Kelley (Metal Exchange Corporation); and John Guckes (John Guckes & Associates, LLP). With a repeat performance of a fabulous Executive Panel Moderator Tim Novak of The World Trade Center – St. Louis and an exciting Keynote from David Stockton of H J Holdings, there was a lively discussion regarding the very real-time challenges facing the global market.
